The high-profile killing of Sikh nationalist Hardeep Singh Nijjar in Surrey, Canada, in June this year. The Canadian government has said it has evidence of Indian involvement in the murder; and now Pakistan is claiming the same. The alarming rise in brutal mob violence in Pakistan, targeting women, the poor, and minorities. An incident in Hyderabad, where a teenager was killed due to a rumor of Holy Quran desecration, exemplifies the intensity of such violence. Mob savagery has extended beyond religious sentiments, involving instances like lynching people over suspicions of child abduction or road rage. The desire for instant justice is rooted in the lack of faith in the justice system and economic distress. The government's approval of an amended bill for public hangings of rapists only exacerbates this issue. The editorial also points out that harsh punishments do not deter such acts but instead contribute to the brutalization of society. Additionally, the police force's inefficiency, inadequate resources, and government neglect are significant factors in mob justice. The blame is placed on the state for its complicity in these violent acts. Harsh punishments do not deter such acts but intensify brutality. The police force's inefficiency and government
