The Polish researchers came across the remains of a woman with a sickle around her neck and a triangular padlock on her foot at a gravesite in the village of Pień. The dead body of a female "vampire" has been excavated by archaeologists at a graveyard in Pień, Poland.

The farming tool, according to ancient beliefs, was supposed to prevent a deceased person thought to be a vampire from returning from the dead. The research team, led by Professor Dariusz Polinski of the Nicolaus Copernicus University in Torun, made the unique discovery in late August.

In an interview with the Polish Press Agency PAP, Magdalena Zagrodzka, who represented the research team, said the human remains also had a silk headdress, which was woven with gold or silver thread. While the padlock and sickle are linked to 17th-century superstitions, Zagrodzka said the cap is evidence of the high social status of the deceased.

It was believed that such an arrangement would cause the head to be cut if the deceased tried to “get up.”
